[^] A: as far as i understand, you want to download videos from instagram (4chan) my solution: you have to use this program named Appleseed in order to download videos from 4chan i do this job for you in oc to further help you, Q: Classes that don't fit one of the other I want to create some classes that are not of the base classes. I also don't want them to be inherited. I would like them to be easily modifiable and only the class itself defines the process. Is this possible? For example: class A { virtual void function(); }; class B { virtual void function(); }; class C { virtual void function(); }; Not sure if my question is clear? A: In C++11 and later, you have a new feature (it was introduced in C++11; before that, virtual member functions were marked as being abstract) called final, which allows you to declare that a class is meant to be non-inheritable. There is also a new feature called final keyword. It is not supported by any of the popular compilers yet, but will be soon. class C final { virtual void function(); }; The operator new, new delete are special reserved words that are reserved for system use. C++ standard allows you to declare class template in this case. This is how you declare the template: template class C; This allows you to create a template class, which would be non-inheritable, but with no non-virtual methods. template class C { virtual void function(); }; You could also turn your abstract class into a class template and make its members are non-virtual. C++11 supports class template in 2.9.8.4 Class template. template class A { virtual void function(); }; template class B { virtual void function(); }; template class C : public A, public B { virtual void function(); }; class C
