A case of herpes encephalitis associated with severe hyponatremia, and a review of its pathogenesis. We describe a case of herpes encephalitis with prompt recovery of consciousness following treatment with acyclovir. During a viral illness, a 72-year-old man had marked hyponatremia (119 mEq/L) and a significantly low serum total IgG (731 mg/dL). A CSF examination revealed pleocytosis with high CSF-protein (94 mg/dL), and a herpes simplex virus (HSV) IgG antibody test was positive. Herpes encephalitis with hyponatremia was diagnosed, and he was treated with acyclovir. His mental state recovered rapidly. The patient had no symptoms of hypothyroidism, hypoadrenalism, or diabetes mellitus. The hyponatremia was considered to be related to HSV encephalitis. A review of the pathogenesis of hyponatremia associated with viral infections is discussed. (Newser)

– A new study claims it has determined the approximate time a species will go extinct if it can't adapt to climate change: 75 years. That's about the life span of dogs, according to the article in the journal Nature Climate Change. Scientists calculated how long it would take for a species to move from one climate zone to another, and found that species would most likely die when they cross the line from warm to cold, the Telegraph reports. The average life span of a species is 71 years. The study was conducted by the Zoological Society of London, and was based on a number of factors, including what climate zone a species currently inhabits, how quickly it can reproduce, and how rapidly it can adapt to a new climate. The study also notes that it took into account the ability of a species to adapt to a new climate. It's unlikely that a species could adapt in 75 years, the Telegraph notes, and it should be noted that the study focused mainly on mammals and reptiles, not insects and other invertebrates. This sounds like a typically American attitude. After the Thomas Fire and other such natural disasters occurred, I'm sure you all saw the bumper sticker, "Thank God for the National Weather Service." And many of you probably saw a
