The long-term goal of the applicant is to improve outcomes in terms of the physical, psychosocial, and economic benefits to patients of pharmacologic pain management. In this application, the principal investigator proposes to gain the training necessary to become an independent clinical investigator. Specifically, the aim of this project is to investigate the role of genetic variation in the regulation of pain perception and response to treatment using pain as an endpoint. As part of the academic component of the proposed award, the applicant will participate in a program of research and educational experiences to expand knowledge of genetic and psychosocial issues that occur in pain patients. The training plan involves coursework in human genetics, pain physiology, behavioral pharmacology, pain assessment, and research ethics. The training plan will be supervised by a mentoring team comprising four co-mentors with expertise in each of these areas. The research component of the training plan will focus on a study of interindividual variation in response to treatment with analgesics in patients with rheumatoid arthritis (RA). In this study, pain, mood, and quality of life will be assessed in patients pre- and post-treatment, and the effect of treatment on these measures will be evaluated as a function of variation in the
