I want to give "click" event to a div containing the image. Any suggestions? A: Don't do that. HTML elements have a point in space, and they have been designed to work in the browser, where they have a position: absolute. If you need to locate an element without a position, don't use absolute positioning. If you want to absolutely position a block of content, you can use position: relative. Wrap the image in a div, and position it using relative positioning: Also, use . You can't give a div a src attribute. EDIT: The use of absolute positioning is not deprecated. It is still perfectly valid to use absolute positioning. The point is that you need to understand how browsers position the block. The position property is not deprecated, it has always worked just like that. A practical management algorithm for the treatment of acute pancreatitis
