The present distribution of biodiversity is the result of a continuous dynamic process during the past several million years. During the Late Pleistocene, climatic oscillations caused cycles of glaciation and deglaciation, and changes in the distribution of past and present vegetation and landforms. This in turn have had consequences for the distribution of species. These changes appear to have led to new and stable species distributions during glacial periods, and to areas of sympatry between species during interglacial periods. The present distribution of species can be due to the effects of (1) interglacial periods, (2) climate change, (3) Pleistocene landforms, and (4) landforms created by man during the Holocene. (1) During interglacial periods, new taxa are able to evolve and colonize new ranges. Vegetation and landforms stabilize and restrict species distributions. (2) Climate change modifies the environment, which in turn controls species distribution. (3) Recent and Holocene landforms affect species distribution. Collisions, and fragmentation of species ranges, e.g. from human-induced land-scaping, cause retraction, and extinction in several species. (4) Man-made landforms, including roads, quarries, towns, etc., affect species distributions because they isolate species from their natural habitat and prevent dispersal, or limit habitats. In the Great Lakes region of Europe, there are probably many species that have a restricted distribution because of past landforms and present human-induced changes. At present, however, there is little or no evidence that there are habitat gaps between species and their ranges. The values of species and ecosystems are often considered to be in competition for space, but this is a very old idea. It is time that new methods of relating areas to species distributions are applied to the study of biodiversity. The method developed by Simon and Honig (1983) to relate areas to species distributions is discussed and its application to the Great Lakes region of Europe and other regions is outlined.Q: Receive GTalk chat message on app after login: w/o Firebase I'm using Google Firebase to store my user data for my iOS
